

He acquires humility through the trials and difficulties that he endures throughout his journey. For instance, he was deeply saddened by the death of Enkidu. The loss of a plant of immortality further changed Gilgamesh's personality. He understood that he could not live forever and was not majestic as he believed himself to be.

Though the epic started with the main character Gilgamesh having negative characteristics, however, their adventure changed his perspective of life, and he acquired many virtues. Through this, from my point of view, I will conclude Gilgamesh to be a virtuous King since he changed for better and that is what he will be known for not what he was.

When Enkidu enters Gilgamesh's life, the two become friends this is the time Gilgamesh's transformation begins, he turns into a hero worthy of remembrance. The great love this two had for each other changed Gilgamesh into the right person. Enkidu's affection and friendship made him understand the meaning of many things including life which Gilgamesh had been wasting in cruelty. Before Enkidu's emergence, Gilgamesh engaged in every immoral and evil thing. The fulfilment of his bodily desires was essential for him.

They both encourage each other and go for a journey to face Humbaba. Enkidu was not fond of these adventures, and he ended up dying. Gilgamesh is shocked and saddened by his friend's death and departs in search of immortality. Before we realize these questions of life and death, mortality and immortality never crossed his mind. He used to be engrossed in his pursuit of ordinary pleasures.

Nevertheless, the death of Enkidu affects him profoundly. He found the pain of his friend's death unbearable. "What my brother I know, what shall I be" (97). He went out to look for everlasting life that he might find the solution of mortality. He found it difficult to
