Good morning, class,

I have used both Indeed and Snagajob to locate and apply to jobs successfully. Snagajob is easy to use and has different search options. You can check out the recently added section, urgently hiring section, and jobs that are in high demand. The search bar allows you to focus your search within the radius you choose. You can upload your resume to your profile, edit your bio to include your mission statement, and upload a professional picture of yourself. When you are looking at a job, this website also displays commute times if you are driving, taking the bus, or walking.

One downfall of this site that I discovered is that while you can upload a resume to your profile, when you go to apply to a job, it redirects to to the hiring jobs website, and makes create an account with that site. This gets very annoying when you are applying to multiple places. I believe with Indeed, there are many jobs that allow you to apply directly on the Indeed website and will display if it directs you to the company website to apply.

Hi Professor & Hi Class,

LinkedIn

At its very core, LinkedIn is a professional networking tool that facilitates effortless communication between employees, peers, businesses, and consumers. And while it's much more than a job listing site, one of the key aspects of LinkedIn lies in job search functionality.

Pros of Using LinkedIn

The great thing about LinkedIn is that most people are already on the site. (At least you should be if you're looking for a job.) This means there's very little additional setup or registration that must take place in order to start finding jobs. Furthermore, you can rest assured knowing that any business you're interested in working for is on LinkedIn. This makes LinkedIn an extremely comprehensive tool.

Cons of Using LinkedIn

Because LinkedIn isn't a job site in the traditional sense of the term, it's not the easiest option. Companies aren't always willing to list openings on LinkedIn for fear that it will damage their reputation. This means you have to do a lot more digging to actually find which opportunities exist.
