

diate aim of the Communists is the same as that of all the other proletarian parties: formation of the proletariat into a class, overthrow of the bourgeois supremacy, conquest of political power by the proletariat" (77). Marx's idea was to keep the country from being divided by class or dominated by the power of the bourgeois. If wealth were national, then every citizen would have a common property. For example, if the workers work in a factory, they do not have to worry about food or housing because the country will let every worker eat together for free in the industry or maybe they will be given houses for their families. Wealth is also relative to the common property, that is, the common property of the country. The poor also have some power to balance the society not to have most of the country's wealth taken up by the few. Of course, the idea of communism is a wonderful but optimistic utopia because in society, people are greedy. As long as one person has a greedy mind about public property, the country may soon be in chaos again.

All countries in the world now have free markets, private properties, and unequal classes. It seems hard to change these realities. In many factories and companies around the world, there are still a large number of people with low wages and even more people living on the streets due to the increasing prices of houses. Capitalists are bound to save as much as they can for their own sake, so unless the country regulates and raises the minimum wage, there will still be repression. For me, we can only learn knowledge or unique skills to distinguish ourselves from the public to ensure that we cannot be troubled by the cost of living in the first place. Getting an education and knowledge may significantly improve our chances of success. Can we improve the low wage income problem faced by workers? This is still a problem.
