

Caridad McCormick

Aug 11, 9:50 AM

This is an essay not an article, furthermore, don't tell your reader what you are going "to look into", just present yo

Show more

Caridad McCormick

Aug 11, 9:53 AM

This entire paragraph is very difficult to read due to marked grammatical errors.

Caridad McCormick

Aug 11, 9:54 AM

incorrectly written

Caridad McCormick

Aug 11, 9:54 AM

on

Murias 2

Dominant in the short story, Story of an hour, is men's control over women in the society. Although men are chauvinistic, women live and adheres to their rules. Louise, the protagonist in the book, is respectful and submissive to her husband despite him being oppressive. She does not have possession of money nor property and this leads to her being very dependent to Brently. Furthermore, according to the law, despite going through such situation, she is not supposed to express herself emotionally. Louise is not happy in marriage. Thus, this leads to her getting a heart disease that impairs her immunity. On receiving news that Brently has passed away, she mourns as expected by the society. Louise views her husband's death as being released from oppression. Deep within Louise, she yearns for freedom and murmurs freedom to herself (Chopin 4-67). When Brently reappears, Louise collapses and dies because the freedom she thinks she have is only but a wish. Her prayers, joy and subsequent death depicts women's hope to gain freedom and equality in the society. However, men are an obstacle in achieving this equality and freedom.

How are gender roles portrayed in the Short Story, "Story of an hour"?

MacBook Pro