The first narrator of Greasy Lake and his friends had bad characters since they used to wear a toned leather jacket and sniffed glue but the author seems so to support them by trying to portrait an image that they are not bad guys by saying that sometimes winning ways direct someone to bad things. Additionally, the first narrator of the Greasy Lake and his friends like clubbing since the author state that, during their third day in a vacation they visited several clubs. Consequently, the author portrays them as liveliest since Digby used to wear a gold earring in his right ear, while the Jeff was planning to quit school to start a music career. However, the author portrays there a positive character in a section where they were confronted by girls who were drunk and one of the girl asked them whether they wanted to party but Digby responded politely to them that they were not willing to party. Furthermore, they were also involved in a fight whereby the author states that Digby battered a greasy character's collarbone with a merciless kung-fu blow while the Jeff was biting the ears of the guy. However, the author tries to undermine the narrator bad behavior by stating that the narrator doesn't like fighting and his last time when he was involved in a fight was when he was in sixth grade.
