The Troy

Troy was a city believed to be in the western shore of what was at that time called Asia Minor. During the time, various elements such as trading, war, way of governance did a lot to shape how a city progressed and how it related with its neighbors. This will form the basis of the research of Troy as I look at how elements of trades, war, and even leadership shaped the performance of Troy.

Efe, Turan. "The theories of the 'Great Caravan Route' between Cilicia and Troy: The Early Bronze Age III period in inland western Anatolia." Anatolian Studies 57 (2007): 47-64.

This source is very credible to my research as the authors have looked at the trading route that existed between Troy and Cilicia and passing through what was called Trojan. The source further looks at how the presence of this route changed the social and economic cultures of the cities it linked, and how these cities had to change to survive and relate with one another.

Leaf, Walter. Troy. Cambridge University Press, 2014. In this source, the issues of leadership and war have been addressed at length. The authors give an account of how the Troy as a city survived both on its own and as a neighbor of other parties present in the region at the time.

Additionally, the authors have addressed how leadership transformed from one rule to another, differentiating how these aspects shaped the relationships that existed within Troy and how the people felt towards their leaders as well.
