whatever they wish.

Formal education has been designed in such a way that it will help individuals develop their thinking and reason, creativity, and other social qualities.

According to Jefferson, education is supposed to free people from enslavement from other social institutions such as religion.

Jefferson designed a form of education and institutions that promoted free-thinking and developed means to protect such institutions from religion's influence. Religion was viewed as an impediment to free thinking. Jefferson allowed religious people to "attend lectures there and have the free use of our library and
