IOM is a comprehensive assessment of the nursing personnel. The IOM offers recommendations within the report that focus on the vital connection between the health wants of distinct, changing patient populace across the lifetime and the activities of the nursing workforce (Palatnik, 2016). The recommendations are projected to support attempts to improve the health of the United States population through the nurses' inputs to the delivery of care. This paper will "summarize the four messages drawn in the IOM report, explain their significance to the nursing profession, discuss the direct influence the IOM report has on nursing education and nursing leadership, describe the benefits and opportunities for BSN-prepared nurses." The paper will also "explain why it is important that a nurses' role and education evolve to meet the needs of an aging and increasingly diverse population, discuss the significance of professional development, or lifetime learning, and its relevance in caring for diverse populations across the life span and within the healthcare continuum, and discuss how nurses can assist in effectively managing patient care within an evolving healthcare system."

Summation of the four information drawn in the IOM report and their importance to nursing practice

The four main information drawn in the IOM report are nurses to perform to the highest degree of their training and education, nurses to get higher levels of education and training via an bettered education structure, which promotes an uninterrupted academic progression (IOM, 2010). in the United States. Finally, better information structure and data collection are required for effective policymaking and workforce planning.

The IOM report is very significant to nursing practice because the recommendations it provides act as a blueprint that will ensure that nurses can improve their nursing education, which will provide them with more skills to provide care and the tools they require to impact the lives of people positively. This is because it is challenging to provide the best care and getting well educated is key. Permitting nurses to work to the full capacity of their training and education is significant in helping build the nursing workforce that is required to build the primary care needs of the US and utilize their inimitable skills to the provision of community-based, patient-centered healthcare (IOM, 2010). Besides, it provides nurses with opportunities to take on leadership rinks and to work as complete partners in redesigning healthcare.

The absolute effect of the "IOM report on nursing education and nursing leadership"

The IOM report directly influences nursing education in such a way that all nurses will be required to attain higher education levels to meet the requirements of the changing healthcare system. The nursing education system will have to improve nursing competencies, enroll many nurse students, and change the nursing curriculum to include all the IOM recommendations (Palatnik 2016). On the other hand, through the lifetime of learning, training, and nurses becoming full partners with physicians and other healthcare workforce, nurses have increased leadership skills that enable them to influence others to improve healthcare quality.

The importance of the evolution of the role and education of the nurse to achieve the wants of growing old and progressively varied populace

With the challenges, changes, and complexity of the healthcare system, the role and education need of a nurse to evolve to meet the increased wants of growing old and progressively varied populations. Increasing education provides nurses with skills, knowledge, and experience that enables them to tackle greater responsibilities such as dealing with numerous physical and mental health-related issues in the aging population and their wants will help in yielding better outcomes and patients who are more satisfied (Price & Echevarria, 2017).

The importance of professional development and its significance in caring for distinct populace throughout the lifecycle and in the continuum of health-disease

Professional development is vital in that it helps nurses to not only be competent in their nursing profession but also excel in it. It also ensures that skills and knowledge remain pertinent and up to date. Besides, it enhances an individual's understanding around him and provides him with more and better opportunities to improve the quality of care. Lifelong learning is significant in caring for the different populace as it provides nurses with problem-solving and critical-thinking skills that help them resolve issues they encounter as they take care of the different populations in the continuum of health-illness (Price & Reichert, 2017).

How nurses can help in successfully managing patient care in a changing healthcare system
