

Collaborative Stewardship

In essence, I am referring to a God-ordained guardianship that is accountable to the community. Again, such a responsibility requires the monitoring of very specific indicators, measures seen in relation to explicit goals, both formative (process-oriented) and summative (overall impact oriented,) work in the form of sustained attention to detail in order to prevent adversity and to correct where necessary the functions that falls short of the collective -life promoting--vision of community.

To whom does the exercise of collaborative stewardship refer?

Collaborative stewardship pertains to the full assortment of stakeholders who provide services within a jurisdiction. Those stakeholders would include but not be limited to governmental entities and non-governmental entities: community-based organizations, non-profit organizations, private organizations, businesses, educational institutions, medical institutions, public service entities, and religious organizations. In other words, the collaborative stewardship constitutes vigilant pursuit of the betterment of the community via collective action.

How is collaborative stewardship to be performed?

Collaborative stewardship will be performed through monitoring of accountability, discrepancy, and change in the community that may be facilitated by the configuration of entities within a geographic area.
