Nursing influence on patient outcomes

Direct Quote?
Nurses are a key role to play towards the improvement of the patient outcomes and the experiences of the patients. Nursing forms an essential part of the healthcare services and has the prospective of having a broad as well as a lasting effect on the health outcomes for the worldwide aging population. Nurses are continuously developing new roles as well as assumed the greater responsibilities (Coster, Watkins, & Norman, 2018). The healthcare outcome of the patients is greatly influenced by the quality of healthcare being provided to the patients.

Nurses are playing the leading role in meeting the needs of the patients being cared for at home, within the community, and in the healthcare facilities. These needs are important in saving the life of the patients, for example, the process of resuscitation following cardiac arrest or intensive care. Nursing care also involves helping the patient with a long-term disease like diabetes or kidney failure. Nurses are also involved in caring for sick children, frail elderly individuals, and people who are not having homes or suffering from severe mental illness. In all these situations, it is necessary for the nurses to combine a skilled technical care with compassion and caring. cite?

Due to the wider perspective of the nursing roles and its impact on the individuals, healthcare organization has vested their interest in making sure that the care being provided by the nurses are effective. The approaches of measuring the effectiveness of healthcare being provided include the development of the quality measures to help in the assessment of whether a nursing intervention has achieved what it is intended for and has caused some improvements. This is what is described as the outcome of the patients. cite

In order to achieve this quality healthcare outcome, it is important to provide nurses with the necessary resources such as increased number of nursing staffs and the tools necessary to
