

* System Education between Canada and Saudi Arabia *

give background instead of outlining main points

The school systems in Saudi Arabia and Canada are both similar and different. Student's home work, punishment, discussion, and extra curricular activities are ^{the} same for both countries. Also, ~~the~~ teacher training is similar for both countries. However, Student's uniforms, the way they sit in class, manner they stand up in class for the teacher and their rewards are all different. Another big difference is that the gender is important for teachers in the two countries. Even though the countries have their differences in education, the systems are more similar than different.

First of all, there are many similarities. In both countries, homework for elementary students is very similar. Students have very little homework because they complete their work with the teacher in the class. Then for middle school and high school, students spend up to four hours doing their homework, depending on the students' abilities. Another way the countries' schools are the same (in).

the punishment. Students could be sent out of the class, ^{lose} ~~lose~~ ^{WF} marks, ~~or~~ have their parents called, or the students are sent to the principal.

Also, when students are discussing topics in class, the discussion is the same for both countries. In addition, the extra curricular programs are equal in both countries. Both Saudi Arabian and Canadian schools take their students on field trip[#]. For example, they have art clubs, drama clubs, invention and technology clubs, and many different types of sport teams. Finally, teachers in both countries have [?]family training. They finish high school, then University, and then do a special year at University to teach their specific subject^{SP}.

In contrast to the similarities, the school systems are also different. In Saudi Arabia all students wear uniforms^{SP}, and they are different colours according to the different cities. For example, (In Makkah, elementary students wear dark green; middle students wear dark brown, and high school students wear dark blue^{SP} (navy)). (Unlike Saudi Arabian schools, or private schools^{SP}), the colours depend on the school. Different from Saudi Arabian schools is how students sit in the classroom. In Canada, students sit together, sometimes at tables for group activities. However, In Saudi Arabia students almost always sit in desks in rows. Saudi Arabia schools can be both in formal when the teacher ^{simple present} enters the class, and the students will stand up. ^{the} On other hand, ^{which students} students are more informal and would never stand up when a teacher enters the class. Another difference are ^{SVA}

the rewards students receive from the teachers. For example, ⁱ In Saudi Arabia, the teacher may give the students gifts like books, watches or jewelry. In Canada, rewards maybe something much more simple like spare time to play games or small rewards like book marks. (One of biggest differences with the two systems in the gender of the teachers.) ^{FF} In Saudi Arabia, boys are always taught by men and the girls are always taught by women in all the levels. However, ⁽ⁱ⁾ In Canada, in elementary school, the teachers are mostly women, and then high school there are more male teachers but ⁱⁿ ^{sp} all ^{re} grades the gender does not matter.)

In conclusion, there are many differences and similarities in the Saudi Arabia ^{WF} and Canada ^{WF} education systems; however, they are mostly the same when you compare them ^{so} together.
