

Sonora's dad, who was a widower, was a hero to her for having managed to raise his six children all by himself. With this feeling, she thought that her father deserved an honor of having a day to celebrate him. Deciding on this day, which was the third Sunday of every June, was an innovation of a day that every other individual globally also thought it was nice to honor their fathers. Every father that realizes that their children recognizes and appreciates them will have a moment of happiness and every mistake that is committed by the child during their previous moments is easily erased by a single good deed by the child (Daniel, 2006).

Every couple has ~~been~~ that has children ~~would~~ want to convince themselves that their children are the key contributor to their happiness. This is highly contrasted by the research findings by the psychologists. It is evidently discovered that even though most of the couples tend to be happy during their early times of marriage while time goes by, this happiness is slowly diminished. The situation is normally more critical when parenting starts and children are brought up to a moment when they have grown to being young adults.

When taking care of the children, parents get distant and as long as the children are ~~in presence of~~ ^{present their} their happiness cannot be restored. However it is during the moment that the children start moving out of the family that the parents tend to acquire the empty nest syndrome (Daniel, 2006). When the last child ~~has~~ moved out ~~of the~~ family the parents are likely to feel that they are no longer tied to their children and ~~probably~~ the work is over.
