

SOCIAL SCIENCES

The social sciences are concerned with the study of people, their history and development, and how they interact and function together. These disciplines deal with the political, economic, social, cultural, and behavioral aspects of people. Social scientists study how we live, how we act, how we dress, how we get along with others, and how our culture is similar to and different from other cultures. By reading in the social sciences, you will learn a great deal about yourself and those around you. In “A Surveillance Society” you will read about how surveillance cameras make our daily activities more public. “The New Flirting Game” examines a much more personal form of human interaction—flirtation. “Coming Into My Own” considers a social problem—racial discrimination—and shows how an African American neurosurgeon dealt with it. Use the following tips when reading in the social sciences.

TIPS FOR READING IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES

- Pay attention to terminology. The social sciences use precise terminology to describe their subject matter. Learn terms that describe behavior, name stages and processes, and label principles, theories, and models. Also learn the names of important researchers and theorists. As you read, highlight new terms. You can transfer them later to index cards or a vocabulary log for that course.
- Understand explanations and theories. The social sciences are devoted, in part, to explaining how people behave as they do. In this chapter you will read an explanation of how people flirt, for example. As you read theories and explanations, ask these questions: What behavior is being explained? What evidence is offered that it is correct? Of what use is the explanation?
- Look for supporting evidence. As you read, look for details, examples, anecdotes, or research evidence that demonstrates that the writer's explanations are reasonable or correct. When reading “The New Flirting Game,” look for the author's examples of women's flirting behaviors, for instance. Often, too, in the social sciences, the examples and applications are highly interesting and will help you remember the theories they illustrate.
- Make comparisons and connections. Try to see relationships and make comparisons. Draw connections between topics. Sketch charts or maps that compare different explanations, for example.
- Make practical applications. As you read, consider how the information is useful to you in real-life situations. Make marginal notes of situations that illustrate what you are reading about. Write comments, for example, about what you have observed about flirting or about instances of racial discrimination.
