

In response to the last part of questions I do think that the black death was followed by a long series of events that ultimately changed the lives of many people across the world. Lords of the Feudal system began to think rationally & were asking for higher wages to guarantee a better living. Education was becoming more & more important for people to make rational decisions. The renaissance found that their skills were in greater demand so they were able to negotiate with the church on a better wages. Those who were poor before the plague were finally able to have better meals and make a better living out of their skills.
