

On daily occasions human beings are subjected, whether voluntary or involuntary; to situations forcing them make big decisions without any clue to their outcome. Apparently, these decisions lead some of individuals be faced by dilemmas regarding whether to execute their decisions since they do not what they need, want or desire. Nevertheless, transformative decisions are life-altering aspects that changes human cognitive thinking permanently as they acquire new status, life and a different version of self. Therefore, it becomes hard to plan and make rational decisions as no one is sure to the certainty of the underlying transformative decision being made.

In his article, "The Big Decisions," David Brooks asserts that transformative decisions may be likened with the choice of becoming a vampire where with a magical bite individual transforms to a new superhuman life. However, as notified that such a new life may be incredible, though irreversible, it may be nasty and difficulty to make the choice and acquire a new self without having a clear consent on how it feels, thereafter. Getting a child, becoming a military officer, marrying, switching religions, immigrating and change of careers are part of the transformative decisions that to a bigger extent face human beings in their living.

Brooks argues that a pure version of such experience deciding on whether to have a child, or not. Empirically, individuals who have children have revealed to suffer a loss in their well-being. They appear more exhausted and tend to drive a lower satisfied life than their childless counterparts. However, once a parent the chances of presuming the former pre-parental self are minimal and infeasible. Similarly, other transformative decisions follow this lineage of irreversibility of the self. In the manner like, Brooks argues that asking the right questions is the only aspect that drives the right decision.

Your essay draft has potential but it needs further development. The introduction is focused and demonstrates reasonable language control. The subsequent paragraphs summarize Brooks' article, but the language control is not as good as it is in the first paragraph. You also need to develop the response portion of your essay.
