Summary Article 2

In the article “Russian Agent Pleads Guilty to Funneling Tech to Russian Military” by Johnny Dwyer and Matthew Deluca, we learn that a 49 year old man that lives in Houston has plead guilty against the New York Federal Court, for sending US Military Technology to Russia. He has been working in Houston since 1998, and has dual citizenship – American and Russian. He has sent a lot of vital information to Russia. Since 2002, he has sent more than $50 Million worth of technology to Russia.

He is not working alone, and there are 4 other men who also pled guilty, and 3 others are awaiting trial. When thinking of crimes like this, we start thinking about how much this is happening all over the world. It is crazy to think that people are willing to risk their lives, all over the world, to send “special” and “important” information to other countries. What exactly is the information that he is sending? The article does not state exactly what it is that he sends to the FSB and military, though we can definitely conclude that it is something important and shouldn’t get into the wrong hands, or else why would he get in trouble? It is a scary thought to see what kind of world we live in today.

Can information like this not be received any other way? Is there really enough “secretive” information in every country that we have to try to steal it? Those are the biggest
