STEP 1

The collection of photographs is telling a story about the state of what looks like someone's room. The photographs detail different parts of the room, and one can spot some clothes that are hung in a messy way and a sink that is quite messy. The meaning I derive from this collection is a representation of the artist's state of mind. He must have been feeling so confused and crowded with many different ideas and he chose this collection to represent the state of his mind. It doesn't mean that the content of the room is useless or that the room cannot look great, but it surely requires some effort to bring things in order in this particular room. So is the situation in the artist's mind; he is experiencing many but different ideas, and he does not know how to bring them out. His mind is crowded, and any attempt to share what he has comes out quite contrary to his expectation. The ideas he has are good, but he has to figure out a way to bring them to life without one conflicting with the other. The artist is feeling disappointed and frustrated now that he cannot express the many and valuable ideas or feelings that crowd his mind. A perfect way out would be to take out one idea or feeling at a time, share it and they push it out as far as he can from his mind. So is the feeling many of us experience when we face multiple tragedies in life; we are put at a crossroad where we have to figure out how to connect the dots and journey on.

Telling this story helped me relate more with what the artist was going through. Actually, I felt like I was in the exact situation in my life and I could relate to how cornered and confused he must have been. All kinds of thoughts were racing through my mind, and any attempt to express them came out messy. Other viewers will have a different opinion from mine; some might interpret the collection as a representation of reckless, carefree living or even an untidy character.
