

COMM 111A Introduction to Public Speaking Guidelines for Self-Evaluations

Purpose:	To reflect on your preparation and performance of your major speeches
Length:	Approximately 2 pages (double-spaced, 12 pt. font, 1-inch margins)
Objectives:	To demonstrate your ability to put public speaking principles into practice To identify areas of excellence and areas for continued growth To articulate goals for future public speaking exercises
Due:	The first class session following your performance (or other time as directed by your instructor)

After each of your four main speeches, you will write a short self-evaluation of your preparation and performance. The point of these self-evaluations is to help you develop the habit of "reflective practice." This means that you will take some time to reflect on your practice and assess your overall effort so that you can continue to improve as a speaker.

Much like an athletic or musical performance, improvement comes from taking stock of your preparation for the event as well as the strengths and areas for continued development. In the context of public speaking, then, the self-evaluation should address the following key areas – one paragraph each:

1. Overall assessment: in a short opening paragraph, describe your overall sense of your effort, perhaps identifying one or two of the most notable aspects of your preparation and performance
2. Preparation: what is your overall assessment of your preparation of the speech? Were there certain aspects of invention, research, or audience analysis that made your speech strong? What things posed challenges for you or were a struggle?
3. Performance: what is your overall assessment of the performance? What do you think you did well, and what dimensions of your performance presented problems for you or your audience?
4. Future plans: what do you plan to work on for the next speech? What are the key areas for improvement or development?

Your instructor may ask you to address specific items in your self-evaluation. However, the areas noted above are intended to help you think about the entire speech process and identify both your strengths and areas that deserve more attention.

My speech was about the issue of not respecting other culture. From my point of view I think I did a good speech. However, I believe I could have done better than what I did. I believe I present my introduction very well. On the other hand, I missed or lost some points in the middle of my speech. That's because I really did not practice my speech with someone. I spent most of my time practicing my speech in my MIND. Which reflect in giving unsatisfaction speech.

How was my preparation? My organization for the speech was not good enough, why? That because I didn't practice my speech in front of someone. I was all the time practicing my speech in my room by my self . And that led me by a negative way in my performance in front of my audience. When I was thinking about what I am going to talk about. I was looking for the issue I have faced it and lived it so its will be strong and effect my audience attention so I chose to talk about not respecting other culture, which I believed its highly took my audience attention.

My overall performance of my speech was just good. However, I was expecting a much better performance from my self. I think I did a very good job with my eye contact as well as my body language. In addition to those two, I liked how I asked questions to my audience which helped me more to take their attention and makes them active with my speech. Also, I liked my conclusion especially when I end it with "treat people the way you want to be treated". On the other side, I didn't like my second part of my body. The reason is because I lost for a few seconds.

For my next speeches I am planing to work more in my preparation. I will practice my speech in front of some people. Also, I will organized my speech more in order to keep in track with it so I do not get lost while I am presenting. Moreover, I will keep track of the time while practicing because it's a good method of preparation for giving a good speech. Also, I will include some information from different resources such as: newspaper, Internet...etc.
